one is entirely unsuited to an ther not far distant. In using manures some soms give a better return than others from guana; sulphate of ammonia acts well on most, and although it is regarded as exhausting in its effects, it is much liked in bringing on the canes. The proper way to do is to have the soil analysed to ascertain what is wanting in it for the growth and debelopment of cane, and to supply that in the manure Ploughing by steam has proved a great advantage; the best time for using the steam plough is when the weather is dry, so that the engines can move about easily; and besides, the soil at such times can get well aired, the wet season, when the soil is soft. Land which has been steam ploughed is worked easier, and the laborers prefer to get on it, although the tasks are larger. The steam plough ha this disadvantage, that on some West India estates there are open drains every twenty-four feet, into which the plough, no matter how carefully managed, sometimes inconveniently slips. Whenever the crop is over, and the wet eason begins, the plants are put in, and this is continued as long as the weather permits, if there be land lying idle.
